FAQs

1. Do I need to take a break from gel manicure to let my nails 'breathe'?

Nail Anatomy

It may not be necessary to take break as long as the gel manicures are applied and removed CORRECTLY.

In fact, humans' nail plate doesn't breathe; it doesn't need oxygen. Because it is made up of non-living keratin. The nail plate stays healthy if the nail bed, matrix, and surrounding tissue are properly cared for. Nails don't need to "breathe" to be healthy. So, it is actually okay to have back-to-back gel manicures.

2. Why are my nails so brittle, thin and broken after gel manicures?

- Overfiling – If your nailist remove the gel and overfile off the natural nails, your nail plate becomes thinner.

TGB BIAB™ doesn't need to be filed off completely from your nails (during removal) and a thin layer can be left behind as a protective barrier. So, don't worry!

- Self-removal – You are your own culprit if you don't go back for gel removal (or a redo) and always peel, pick, and scrape off your gel yourself. Gel should be removed by a nailist at a nail salon with the right technique.
- Aging and body's nutritional deficiencies – Some people are born with lots of keratin and strong shiny nails, some just aren't. Also it could be because you lack vitamin E, or even, simply the body is just getting older.
